H.

H, h, English black letter ℌ, ℎ, English Saxon Þ, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ה. The Phenicians, most ancient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigean monument, having consulted to express the long sound of E, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἁμα, ὁδος, &c. instead of the old Ionic HAMA and HOΔOΣ, endeavouring, I say; for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they had quite left it out in the middle, writing Ενοδια and Ταως, for ENHOΔIA and TAHΩΣ; and where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously for PHAMNOΣ, PHETΩP, HYPPOΣ, &c. writing Ῥαμνος, Ῥητωρ, Πυῤῥος, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but sounded after, the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, probably was the reason why some of the ancient grammarians, and amongst the rest our great master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would also recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer א and ה, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher ע and ח the parent of H, must be exterminated from the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristic of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must be either a vowel or a consonant." Yea, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But sure it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes φ, θ, χ, which anciently were not in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother ח, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than a hard aspiration; and in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly substituted for it, as χαλω, halo, χαω, hio, χαμαι, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mihi, nihil; which also may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the second order of the mutes, which constitute their second conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the same termination; for as πλεκω, λεγω, τρεχω, move into ξ in the future tense; so dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tense. But others think it no letter, because the Latin Poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves so much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpose: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much disregarded by the Latin Poets; and especially the final s, which even before a consonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aspiration is frequently in Latin expressed by s, as ἡμι, semi, ἑξ, sex; and are these therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aspirate is set before all the vowels, as habeo, hebeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no consonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philosophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the same use had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. sepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; whereof the two first seem to have been so pronounced by some before and in Cicero's time, as he expressly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and subjoining h to consonants and vowels was indeed used in pronunciation, but condemned by the best judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witnesses, laughing Arrius to scorn, Ep. 84. for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinsidias. Cicero truly soon after, knowing very well that the ancients used not this aspirate insertion, for some time used to say pulcrior, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet seems afterwards to have espoused the aspirate way, at least in some words, as judging the sound more masculine and sprightly; for upon that account, as we partly learn from himself, but more expressly from A. Gellius, N. A. 2. 3. this custom was introduced. However, this way, though sparingly, and in few words used at first, grew into such a ridiculous excess, that some said chenturia, choronа, prœcho, vid. Quint. Instit. Orat. 1. 5. Concerning the intercourse which h has with the Æolic digamma, see the letter F. I, J.

I, i, and in black English letter, ℑ, í, Latin, I, i, Greek, with little variation, I, ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel having the smallest sound as well as figure, is most fitly suited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epist. 1. 109.

Nec mihi sunt vires inimicos pellere tectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel seven times, and the next small sound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the subject rises, as in the sublime, the frequent use of it is to be avoided. For this reason Virgil has in the Æneid written olli for illi near twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgics. Hence also comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to strengthen the sound, as Jupiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other instances which might be given out of the old manuscripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly show. This vowel in Latin compounds is also substituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The sound of this to the next small vowel e is so near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expressed them both by one character, before the invention of points, and the changes of i into e, and vice versâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be observed; as in μίνθα, mentha, τεγγω, tingo. Add also, that in many words purely Latin these vowels are written indifferently, as mage and magis, here and heri; Mage pollens aer, Lucr. 4. 344. Res hodie minor est here quam fuit, Juv. 3. 23. Yea, many words in the accusative and ablative cases sing. of the third declension end in em or im, e or i. Also in our English tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the same kind. In making Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is subjunctive to the rest, as in hei, hoi, hui, Illithyia. In numerals this, as the smallest letter, is put for the smallest number, I. one, II. two, &c. and, set before the note of a larger number, subtracts itself, as IV. four, IX. nine. In the notes of the ancients, I. is put for Inter, intra, Junius, Julius; IA. P. Intra provinciam; I. AGL. In angulo; IA. D. Jam diu, jam dudum; IA. S. D. Jam satis dudum; IA. RI. Jam respondi.

J, j, English and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as the rest of their letters, a consonant, and has a name as such, though in favour of pronunciation they sometimes use it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its consonant use, we from the vocal. We have, indeed, invented a different figure for the consonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and English, and by some in Hebrew words, like a soft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζευ πατερ, where it may be allowed that harder sound; its true pronunciation being softer, approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr, and our year, being sounded alike. The true sound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the same syllable; and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called ye, as we say, be, ce, &c.

Si hæc vox inceramenta a Livio est, intelligenda videntur ligna ea, quæ a carinis utrimque ascendentia efficiunt costas navis, quorum compages a Græcis dicitur, εντερονεια. At multo magis placet inceramenta, quod exhibent duo codices, unus Gronovio, alter nobis inspectus. Inceramenta erant cera et pix, quâ oblinebantur naves. Utraque vox perrara est, nec fortasse aliud earum exemplum reperias. At inceramentum magis præfert colorem quemdam Latinitatis, quam interamentum. Notum est illud Juvenalis—— Genua incerare deorum. At interare nemo unquam usurpavit, inquit J. B. L. Crevier in locum.

K.

K, k, Roman, K, k, Italic, both which are used in the English and several European languages; 𝔎, 𝔨, black letter English and German, pronounced alone ka, but ought, by analogy, to be called ke, as be, ce, de, and the rest of the mute sisters; Κ, κ, Καππα, Greek, from the Chaldee, כף כפא Kaph, signifying the hollow of the hand, which כ in its figure resembles, the lower part whereof being elongated makes the final ך, and from this inverted is formed the Greek Κ, and by imminution, and bowing the right side, the small κ. The power of which letter is invaded by qu and c; as, κερκις, querqueda, dim. querquedula; κοινον, canum: and in like manner the Latin C is expressed by the Greek Κ; as, Claudius Cæsar, Κλαυδιος Καισαρ. And indeed the Latin C not only answers in sound to K, but also takes its figure from the same Hebrew letter: for as the figure of K is formed from the final ך, as is before showed, so C is nothing but כ turned to the right, in compliance with the western way of writing. Notwithstanding it appears that anciently K held its own place in many (especially Greek) words, and derivatives from thence, as καλαβρα, kalabra, κοινσμος, kœnismus, Καρχηδων, Karthago, καλανδαι, kalendæ; though these also are equally written by c, vid. Quint. Instit. 1. 7. K has also been continued in some words of Hebrew extraction; as, Karissimus, in ancient monuments, from יקר; Kalumnia, from כלכה; K, k, anciently marked on the foreheads of those convicted of calumny. In our English tongue indeed, though disused in Latin, it is not only a frequent letter, but used even after c, to harden its sound; as from λειχω, lick, κικκος, (Hesych. gallus) a chick; which in words of Latin and Greek derivation may well be spared; as public, critic, hectic; not publick, &c.

‖ Kabbala, æ. f. i. e. acceptio, uti contra eadem dicitur, masora, i. e. traditio, doctrina ore tenus tradita a magistris, accepta a discipulis. Tradition, or mysterious knowledge delivered down along from Moses (who, as the rabbins fancy, received it from God) to the fathers, and so continued from hand to hand, to posterity. The Cabbalists were the doctors of this manner of learning. Hinc Anglice, A cabal, a set of men that sit in close council.

[a calando, quod sacerdotes ineunte quovis mense, calarent, i. e. indicerent nonas, unde et Gr. per α, καλανδαι] The calends of a month, i. e. the first day of every month, and so to be reckoned backward. Ad Græcas kalendas, At latter lammas, i. e. never. Proverbium ab Augusto usurpatum, Vid. Suet. Kyrie eleison. [ex Gr. κυριε ελεησον, verso η, ut tum solebat, in ῑ] Lord, have mercy upon us; a form used in the missal, and other Latin prayer-books.

L.

L, l, Roman, L, l, Italic, 𝔏, 𝔩, old English and German, which pronounced alone we call el, prefixing e, as we also pronounce the other sister liquids, el, em, en, er corruptly ar; to distinguish them from the family of the mutes, whose sound we make articulate by postponing e, as be, ce, de, &c. Hebrew ל Lamedh, amongst other significations denoting a goad, or spit, which the figure resembles; Chaldee למדא Lamda, from whence the Greek Lambda, by inserting b; as also by removing m, labda. The Latin L is formed from the Greek Λ, by straightening one of the acute legs, and turning the other into the basis. It has the first place in the order of the liquids, and is, as Plato, in Cratyl. has observed, the sweetest of them, and is suited to soft and easy descriptions; as, Molle meum levibus cor est violabile telis. It was usually sounded by the old Britons with a kind of aspiration, and was writ in many words with ll, as afterwards with lh, as in llân, or lhân, a temple; llâu, or lhâu, a hand; which sound is made, by hissing l obliquely through the teeth, and aspirating it, which indeed is best taken by the ear. Thus the oldest Greeks sounded its sister Ρ when initial, ΡΗ; as ΡΗΟΜΕ, Roma; which in later times, after Η was exterminated, being supplied by a note of aspiration prefixed, though pronounced after it, was written as now, Ῥωμη; and this aspiration is still kept in some Latin words of Greek extraction, as in Rhamnus, Rhetor, &c. This liquid is subjoined to the mutes b, f, g, p, in the beginning of syllables in Latin words, as in blatta, eblandior; flo, confligo; gloria, conglobo; plango, compleo: also to t and th, in derivatives from the Greek, as Atlas, athleta; but never before q and v. All the liquids by grammarians are called immutables; as indeed they are with respect to the mutes, but not in regard to themselves, as we learn from Νυμφη, lympha; ager, agellus; λειριον, lilium; παυρος, paulus. The change indeed of the final letter in the prepositions con, in, per, and inter, into the liquid, when compounding some simple word beginning therewith, seems arbitrary; and we may write either conligo, or colligo: inlido, or illido; perluo, or pelluo; interlego, or intellego, &c. since the former way of writing was of ancient use; as in all the other letters, so even in these particularly; and the latter only introduced to soften the sound: as we see also in prepositions ending with mutes, prefixed to words beginning with mutes or liquids, for the same reason suffer the same, or greater variations; as, absfero, aufero; adnuo, annuo; adfero, affero; obfero, offero; transno, trano, &c. In some few words indeed the liquid l may seem substituted for d; as lacryma for δακρυμα, alacris for αδακρυς; but both these derivations may justly be suspected, unless confirmed by more unexceptionable instances. In numeral notes, L is put for fifty, the half of C, or, as antiently made by the Saxons, Ⅼ, making the curve angular, analogically to V, five, as being half an X, ten. In the compendious notes of the ancients, L. stands for Lælius, Lælia, Lucius, Luceius, Lex, Lector, Libertus, Libra; L. A. Lex alia; LA. C. Latini coloni; L. A. D. Locus alteri datus; L. AG. Lex Agraria; LAT. P. V. E. S. Latus pedes quinque et semissem; L. DD. D. Locum diis dedicavit, L. L. Libræ, vel Lingua Latina, Locus laudabilis, Leges; L. L. OO. Linguæ Orientales; L. M.

M, m, Latin, Μ, μ, Greek, called Μεῦ, either from its sound, the Greek Μικρὸν and the Latin mugio, being formed from hence, or rather from μυω, claudo, because it opens and shuts the lips; מ Hebrew in the beginning and middle of words; ם, or, if the vacant space in the end of a line require it, ם: it is perhaps called מים mem, from its double form, open and shut, which in writing its name is represented; or it may be from מום a blot, which the Arabians use for its figure: 𝔐, m, English and German black letter. Its sound is inarticulate, formed by the mouth through the lips. This letter, though a liquid, suffers no mute in Latin to stand before it in the same syllable, except g, as in agmen; although among the Greeks, who perhaps gave it a softer sound, it follows δ, and τ, as σμιον, ασθμα, τμησις; but in different syllables it does not refuse to usher its sister labials b and p, as ambulo, amplus; also itself and n, as mamma, damnum, but no other: for in order to avoid the company of the rest, it prevails with its neighbour n to be its substitute, as in anceps, anfractus, anhelo, anquiro, ansanctus, (but this is also written amsanctus,) which are all compounded of the inseparable preposition am: but the preposition circum for the most part keeps its m before all letters, though in some few words n is used sometimes indifferently for it, as circundo, or circumdo; and sometimes loses it, as in circueo, circuitio, which however it may equally retain. Before its sister semivowels l and r, its cognates soften the sound. But m is not behindhand in office with its neighbour n, willingly taking its place before the labials b, p, and m, as in imbellis, impius, immodestus; combibo, compleo, commendo: also in the Greek tongue, as εμβαλλω, εμμενω, εμπιπτω, and also anciently in divers words, as in the Sigean Psephism in honour of Antiochus, τημ βασιλειαν, τωμ πραγματων, τημ μεν ιερειαν: also before t, d, and q, as in tantum from tam tum, quendam for quemdam, quenquam for quemquam. M also in Latin words is put for the Greek ν, as in musam for μσαν, organum for οργανον, &c. But in Latin accusatives of the third declension, which answers to the fifth of the Greeks, m is often a formative only, as in patrem, matrem, from πατερα, μητερα. It is also servile in forming tenses of Latin verbs, as notabam, notarem, from notare: this servility perhaps might be the reason why the ancients very obscurely pronounced this letter, especially before a vowel, as optimu'st, factu'st. Cato wrote die' hanc for diem hanc; and probably when not cut off by the poets, who then use it short, as, Cujus non hederæ circumiĕre caput, Propert. 2. 5. 26. not fully pronounced. M in numerals is one thousand, from the first letter of mille according to Priscian, but with more probability from this ancient mark CIↃ, which by the negligence or ignorance of transcribers was drawn together and made ϖ, the half of which, D, from hence stands for five hundred. In the compendious notes of the ancients, M. is used for Manlius, Marcus, Martius, or Mucius; M. Manius; M. B. Mulier bona; MAG. EQ. Magister equitum; MAG. MIL. Magister militum; MAT.P.FEC. & S.P.Q. Mater pia fecit et suis posterisque; M.M.P. Manu, mancipio, potestate.

Modium, ii. n. A bushel, Plin. 18. 42. et ante eum Plaut. sed freq.

Mŏdius, ii. m. [a מדר mensuravit] Modius continet libras 26, uncias 8; semimodius libras 13, uncias 4; sextarius uncias 20; hemina 10; acetabulum, duas et dimidium; cyathus sescunciam, drachmam, et scrupulum; lingula, drachmas tres, et scrupulum unum. (1) A measure, that which we call a bushel, but was indeed, as some reckon, but our peck and half, holding 16 sextiers; not only of dry things, as salt, Cic. beans, Hor. wheat, Cæs. peas, acorns, &c. Col. but of liquids also. (2) Absol. A bushel of wheat. (1) Asse modium populo dedit, Cic. Off. 2. 17. Modius vini Parisinus tricenos senos sextarios nostros capit, sextarius autem octonas eas quas pintas dicimus, Bud. i. e. eight quarts English, Coop. If so, it was 256 of our quarts, which differs much from the account given by him before of dry things, viz. that the modius contained 16 sextiers, and every sextier, according to Bud. 24 ounces, i. e. one pint and half; so that the modius, says he, is just three gallons, i. e. our peck and half. But in wine being 256 quarts it makes 64 gallons, i. e. 32 pecks, or eight bushels. However, modius in liquids being the third part of an amphora, may well be rendered a tierce. Prov. Habent pleno modio verborum honorem, They receive compliments by the bushel, Cic. Att. 6. 1. Multi modii salis simul edendi sunt, ut amicitiæ munus expletum sit, Id. de Amic. c. 19. Modius agri, The same with quadratus actus, a square piece of ground, sixscore feet in length, and as many in breadth. Also the bottom of a mast in a ship, i. e. the step, or place wherein it is put, because it had the form of a bushel, Isid. N.

N, n, Roman, N, n, Italic, both which are, as all the other letters, frequently used in most of the modern languages of Europe; especially such as descend from the Latin. The English indeed, besides these, have a black character somewhat like the German, in which this letter is thus expressed, 𝔑, 𝔫; but of no great antiquity, and seldom used but in printing statutes and proclamations; for our Saxon ancestors used a letter very little differing from the Roman. The Hebrew tongue has a double form of this letter, the one initial and medial, נ, the other final, ן, which might be the cause of calling it נון, which is expressive of both forms; in analogy to מם which probably was so called from the same cause. Indeed there is a great show of reason why it should be called נון from the signification of the word, which is a child, as being the undoubted daughter of her mother מ. The Greeks, in taking these two letters from them, seem to have had regard to both these reasons, discarding the finals in both, as having no occasion for them in their tongue; and yet, to show their near relation, gave them an analogical articulation, calling as the former Μυ, so the latter Νυ. Nor are these two liquids nearer in name, than they are in their figure, sound, and mutual offices in Greek and Latin. With respect to their figure, they differ just so much, and no more, in both the capital and small form, as they do in their sound; M, m, being a fuller sound, having one line more than N, n, the smaller sound, without any other difference. Their nearness in sound is more remarkable because made by distinct organs, the former being a labial, the latter a dental; which is caused by their equally touching the palate.

Nor is their reciprocal use in languages less obvious: The plural termination ים in Hebrew, in the Chaldee dialect is ין; as, on the contrary, the terminations ον and ων in Greek, are um in Latin; as ωον, orum: εκατον, centum; βραχιων, brachium: αι and ης, the terminations of the accus. sing. of the second declension of the Greeks, am in the first declension of the Latins; as μασαι, σχολην, musam, scholam. In Latin derivatives from the Greek, as ν is sometimes changed into m, as in τεον, meo; so on the contrary μ into n, as in μειοω, nileo: and as before the first rank of the mutes, and their sister labial m, n is changed into m for the better sound, as in imbellis, impius, immodicus; so on the contrary, in the second and third order, m is converted into n before c, q, d, t; as in anceps, nunquis, quendam, tantum: which also is done before f and h, as in confractus, anhelus. The change of this letter into her other sister liquids l and r, before another l and r, as in illudo, irrideo, is common, as being only made for the better sound in pure Latin words; but the same is also done in Latin derivatives from the Greek tongue, as in ne from μη, lympha from νυμφη, (whence our master Priscian accounts for the use of the Latin numeral L, instead of N the Greek numeral for 50, The most ancient Greeks, says he, used L for N, which we still herein retain,) in mora from μονη, in crisso, from κνιζω. As γ, before κ, γ, χ, is in Greek sounded like n, so in Latin words derived from such, n is substituted for γ; as ancora, angelus, Anchises, for αγκυρα, αγγελος, Αγχισης, though the more ancient Latins, Accius in particular, as Varro acquaints us, retained g, writing aggulus, aggens, aggxilla, iggerunt; and this not only in derivatives from Greek, but perhaps in some of their own words. In many Latin words from Greek families, n is inserted, especially before mutes of the second and third order, as in mingo, lingo, jungo, scando, frango, from μιγω, λιχω, ζυγω, σκαω, ραγω, the second fut. tense of μιγεω, λειχεω, ζευγω, σκαζω, ρηγσω, which epenthetical custom is worthy to be noted, as by means thereof, from verbs barytones, the Latins naturalized many Greek words. But this inserted n disappears often in their derivatives, as in micturio, ligurio, jugum, conjux, fragor, fragilis; as also before gn, as ignarus, ignavus, cognosco, and others. Besides the letters already mentioned, n admits after it itself, s, and x, (a compound of s, and the second order of the mutes,) as annus, ansa, anxius; and in composition j and v, as conjicio, convoco. In writing some Latin proper names, where ns concur either in the middle or end of words, the Greeks, to soften the sound, leave out n, as Ὀρτησιος, Κλημης, Παδης, for Hortensius, Clemens, Pudens. This letter is often omitted by the Latins, when they enfranchise Greek words ending in ων; as Leo, Draco, for Λεων, Δρακων: contrariwise, to Latin words ending in o, the Greeks add n, writing Κατων, Νερων, for Cato, Nero. In some inscriptions of the middle age, and transcripts of that time from elder originals, we find this letter in long syllables of many words inserted; as Atlans, gigans, elephans: which perhaps may have happened through the ignorance of the transcribers, mistaking a mark set over such syllables, by some of the ancient writers, only to show their quantity, for the letter n. I should have thought they might have affected to put this letter in the direct case of such words, because they found it in the oblique cases, had not such words as formonsus and thensaurus checked that opinion. In the notes of the ancients, N is read Nec, nepos, non, num, Nonius, noster, nomisma, nisi, nummorum, numerator; NAV. Naves, navibus, navicula; NC. Nunc; N.C. Non certe, vel Nero Cæsar, vel Nero Claudius; N.C. O.

O, o, immediately from the original Greek of the same form, wherein also it continues in most of the languages of Europe, indeed all which confess a Greek or Latin descent, the fourth vowel, and fourteenth letter, in the Latin and English alphabets, had a double sound, both short and long, as, if we were not told so by Quint. Inst. 1. 13. is evident in itself. For it could not be otherwise before the invention of ω, several ages after the days of Cadmus; which indeed is not a different letter from o, but the same, with the connotation of a different quantity, or double time, and that also often not observed by the Greek poets; or perhaps o doubled, as its small figure ω seems to evince; and its sound, which differs very little from that of ου, which most anciently was sometimes expressed by a single o, as Fabius tells us, and we are further assured from the Βστροφηδον and Delian inscriptions; in the former whereof we meet ΦΑΝΟΔΙΚΟ ΕΙΜΙ ΤΟ ΗΕΡΜΟΚΡΑΤΟΣ, &c. for Φανοδικον ειμι τον Ἑρμοκρατους, and in the latter ΤΟ ΑΓΥΤΟ ΑΙΘΟ ΑΝΔΡΙΑΣ, for Τα αυτα λιθου. And the name of o itself was originally ου, as Quintilian intimates. What I have said of this fourth vowel, may be alike affirmed of the second ε, which had also two sounds before the invention of η; at which time, as o had both the sound and name of ου, ε seems to have had the sound, and sometimes name, of ει, for anciently they wrote and read ΤΕΙ ΑΓΑΘΕΙ ΤΥΧΕΙ, for τη αγαθη τυχη, as the more modern Greeks wrote: wherein, and in the like words, they however subscribed the extermined ι. Indeed this increase of the number of vowels seems rather introduced from an affectation of novelty, than any real necessity; seeing the Latins, who took a great part of their language from them, never imitated, and indeed never found any occasion for, such an innovation. But the Greeks rested not here, for they invented also six supernumerary consonants ζ, ξ, ψ, and φ, χ, θ, all which are rather nexus literarum than real letters; the three former being only a connecting of the three orders of the mutes and the letter σ; the three latter a connecting the same orders and the letter H. Thus ζ connects the third order with σ, ξ the second order; and ψ the first. In like manner, θ includes H in the first mutes of the third order; χ includes the same in the mutes of the second; and φ does the same in the first order: and all these were written in the first Greek alphabet with two distinct letters. For the letter h held the same place in the Greek alphabet as it does now in the Latin and ours, at the time when these letters, or, more properly, compendious ways of writing, were invented. And here we may observe, that of all these eight new letters, as the Greeks pleased to call them, the Latins only espoused two, ζ and ξ, the former whereof they seldom used, as indeed having no occasion for it, the latter chiefly in Greek words, and servile uses; so unnecessary they accounted these innovations. This I judged proper in this place to observe once for all, to show the perfection of the Cadmean alphabet; and now proceed to a farther dissertation on the letter O. The Greeks, as they framed theirs wholly from the Hebrew alphabet, so undoubtedly had this letter from the Hebrew ע, to which it answers both in the order of the letters and numerals, which in both is seventy. How ο by the Greeks came to be adopted for this Hebrew guttural was sagaciously found out, and judiciously accounted for, by the learned Dr. Littleton; who observes, that the Greeks took their three doubtful vowels a, i, u, from the Hebrew א י ו to which three consonants they assigned the parts of vowels, by the help whereof they read before the invention of points; for א reading a; for י, e and i; for ו, o and u. Now the Greeks observing that the Hebrews had given their first guttural א a vocal power, not knowing how better to transplant them, gave the same power to the three remaining gutturals, making ε from ה he; η from ח kheth, Chald. khetha; and ο from ע, which, as we said above, was first sounded ou, but afterwards, that ο might be upon a level with υ or ou, to which as having a double sound they had given a double character, to the long sound of ο they assigned likewise a double figure Ω, which from its largeness in respect to the ο, they called Ω μεγα, or the great ο, and consequently the primitive ο began to be called ο μικρον, or the little ο. As to the form of ο, this account may be given: Its mother ע signifies either an eye, or a fountain, which this figure in some sort represents; the former with its corner, the latter with its stream. The Greeks, neglecting the adjuncts, drew the eye or fountain orbicular, to express the round form of the mouth in making the sound. This vowel is changed into every other vowel, as every other vowel into it; as from αρατρον aratrum, so from spartum sporta: as from γονυ genu, so from pendo pondus; as from κονις cinis, so from οπιαθε post; as from alo alumnus, so from νυξ nox. This vowel was not in use among some nations of Italy, as Pliny informs us, the Tuscans, and more ancient Umbrians, and therefore u was substituted for it. And indeed the ancient Roman writers sometimes do the same, as Acherunte, bubus, frundescere, &c. Lucr. On the contrary, others used o more frequently for u, writing advorsus, quom, servom, voltis, volnus, &c. for adversus, quum, &c. O is also used by the ancients for au, as codex, colis, plodo, plostrum, for caudex, caulis, &c. In the notes of the ancients, O. CON. is read Opus conductum; O. C. Q. Operâ, consilioque; O. D. M. Operæ donum, munus; O. LO. Opus locatum.
